A FR vehicle with either transmission may be a challenge in snow due to most of the weight being at the end the driving wheels aren't. In FF I would say manual, but with advances in transmission technology, the edge isn't all that big. I've driven both in the snow, and for slip control the manual w/experienced driver wins.

I have not driven a Challenger RT with the M6. I miss driving a manual transmission so much and I am thinking I might consider this. I was thinking the A8 for gas milage but I just figured it out. I drive 12000 annual miles and if I fill up with premium the M6 will only cost $150 more a year in fuel than the A8.

The principles of winter driving are the same whether you're driving an automatic or a manual transmission. You're dealing with reduced grip, so be gradual with your throttle input so you're not getting wheelspin. Brake early and gently. Simple as that. The best way to warm up a car is under a light driving load.

It's been noted that the Manual transmission is better for snow. Unlike the automatic, which does not default to 50/50 torque distribution, the manual transmission DOES. In my experience, the Manual transmission has outperformed the automatic in all snowy conditions I've driven in. But it ultimately depends on which you like to drive more.
